A central sign-up form is highlighted with a blue border. It has the title "Sign up in seconds" and the following fields:

- Name:
- Email:
- Password:
- Or Sign in here

On the right side of the page, there are three numbered circles, each followed by the text "Value Prop":

- 1 Value Prop
- 2 Value Prop
- 3 Value Prop

At the bottom, there are two large text blocks separated by a vertical line:

- 800 Therapists
- 4000 Matches

In the bottom right corner, there are three social media icons: Facebook, Twitter, and Email.

Notes

- This page is feature heavy. I don't think we can/ should build all of these features right now. In my mind, we build the front end and test it... then build the full features and backend.
- I'll include a hierarchy of features just in case you want to start working on them
- The appearance of this page doesn't matter that much right now. As long as the info (or placeholders of the info there.
